Expect the unexpected at the 2026 World Cup

You will see plenty of predictions around this time, with the 2026 World Cup having kicked off June 11.

From breakout players, tournament stars and World Cup winners, there will be no shortage of prognostications.

But many of those will predictions will focus on the familiar, the expected. Harry Kane to win the Golden Boot? You don't say!

Instead, let's talk about some predictions that might not be expected. The bold, the unexpected and yes, the hot takes.

Here are USA TODAY Sports staff's boldest predictions.

France will be knocked out in the round of 16

Les Blues come up well short of a third straight consecutive final, losing in the round of 16 against another heavyweight – which could be Germany or Brazil. Kylian Mbappe will pass Olivier Giroud as France's all-time leading scorer, but it could be a frustrating tournament for the 27-year-old with France not lacking in other attacking options.

– Jesse Yomtov

Three South American teams will reach the round of 16 and Brazil won't be one of them

Brazil will always have the flair players. And the 2026 roster has that with Endrick, Vinicius Junior, Raphinha and the up-and-coming Rayan. But I'm worried about the midfield. Bruno Guimaraes is class, but Fabinho and Casemiro are passed their sell-by date. Over 18 matches of Conmebol qualifying, Brazil finished fifth. This isn't your dad's Brazil. Meanwhile, Colombia, Ecuador, Argentina and Uruguay all have better midfields and I'm counting on that position to be the difference. – Matt Glesnek

Norway joins the long line of disappointing dark horses

Group I, for me, is the group of death, and while Norway will advance as a third-place team, it'll produce a difficult first knockout match that is too tough for Haaland, Odegaard and Company to overcome.

– Jon Arnold

All three host countries make the knockout stages, but none make it as far as the quarterfinals

The "home country boost" will only go so far for the three host nations. For Canada, it means making it to the knockout rounds (this will be uncharted territory for Canada, which has never reached the knockout rounds at a World Cup). For Mexico, it means a knockout win before getting eliminated by England, which I have in the final. Same Portugal's roster features Cristiano Ronaldo, who will be participating in his record sixth World Cup.

PEDRO NUNES/REUTERS

goes for the U.S., which gets a round of 32 win before bowing out against defending World Cup champion Argentina in the round of 16 (this unfortunate break in the bracket is a result of Turkey, not the U.S., winning Group D).

– Jim Reineking

A team that has never won the World Cup will make the final

Only eight countries have won the biggest prize in soccer. But this tournament is without a dominant side, opening the door for Portugal, Netherlands, Croatia or others to break through.

– Erick Smith

Argentina won't come close to a repeat

Argentina is looking to run it back for its title defense, naming a roster filled with many of the same players from its 2022 triumph. But the team relies on players over 30 like Lionel Messi, Rodrigo De Paul and Leandro Paredes, all of whom no longer play in Europe. There is also the fear of coming into this tournament cold, with Argentina stacking up wins against weak friendly opposition over recent months. Playing Mauritania, Angola, Zambia and Puerto Rico is hardly the way to prepare for a title defense.

– Seth Vertelney

Uruguay makes the semifinals over Portugal and Argentina

Uruguay will be tested early with Spain also in Group H, but it is seeking redemption after not making it out of the group stage in 2022 and will play like it. Federico Valverde will step up as a leader with the guidance of manager Marcelo Bielsa, who is no stranger to the World Cup stage. La Celeste could make major statements against powerhouses Argentina and Portugal en route to a semifinals appearance.

– Victoria Hernandez

Some U.S. die-hard soccer fans not all-in over hurdles

Jon Arnold
USA TODAY

When Don Schneider scored tickets to the final of the men's 1994 FIFA World Cup, he did so by calling in. Having traveled to several World Cup tournaments since the last time it was in the U.S., he knew the system had changed quite a bit since then.

But he wasn't ready for just how much it would change.

Schneider and a group of friends have traveled to tournament after tournament, seeing the world by the World Cup, but won't be on the move during this one.

"When the pricing was released, we were all like, 'Oh my God,'" said Schneider, who lives in Edmonds, Washington. "As soon as that pricing came out, it became clear they were optimizing for the short-term, the bottom line, we were all immediately convinced that there's going to be a lot of empty seats at this tournament."

It's part of a larger trend of soccer obsessives who have the resources to travel and attend World Cup matches but who are opting to sit this tournament out because of an increasing number of hurdles they feel are being put up by organizers.

Call it FIFA fatigue. It's not that they won't be watching on TV. Some still will find their way to matches, and all admit they won't be able to totally tune out of the World Cup. But these absolute die-hard soccer fans, many of whom have spent significant time and money traveling to see the sport in the past, are opting out of this tournament because of frustrations with how it's being run.

These fans expected the queues and the travel delays. They didn't expect endless rounds of ticketing, special offers through specific credit card companies or hospitality chains that opened at the top of the hour and "sold out" seconds later.

Is there another phase of FIFA World Cup ticketing?

"I give up, man" is the message that arrives in the inbox of Danny Navarro, better known as TravelFutbolFan, as he picks up our call. After the 2022 World Cup, the Colombian American launched his accounts hoping to be a guide for those who wanted to experience the magic of the host cities across North America.

Instead, he has become a clearing-house of information for fans puzzled by the maze of ticket phases and travel restrictions. That transition in his account has mirrored the discourse in many soccer-loving communities.

"I was just planning to be a travel adviser. As we've gone throughout the years, it's been such a perfect storm of disaster, it feels, that we're going to get half-empty stadiums, that the vibes are off and they're trying to put us into generational poverty," Navarro said.

"People do feel the fatigue of just, 'Look, man, are there tickets available for Mexico's home opener or not?' They're tired of this FOMO marketing campaign."

What will World Cup visitors find when they come to the United States?

Mike Spracklen works in logistics in Dallas but is a longtime member of the local chapter of the American Outlaws, a supporters' group for the U.S. national teams. As soon as North America was announced as the World Cup host, he started planning to be at the United States' matches all summer – whether that meant sacrificing other trips or taking extra time off.

"To be in a stadium in a World Cup game would be absolutely magical no matter what, no matter the country, no matter the matchup, but obviously my excitement was with the U.S.," Spracklen said.

But despite being registered in any supporters' group program he could find and staying updated on information, Spracklen wasn't able to secure tickets to see The Stars and Stripes.

Beyond personal frustration, all three said the current political climate in the U.S. contributed to their lower-than-expected level of enthusiasm for the tournament.

"Originally, the most exciting thing about hosting the Cup was what it could do for the U.S., how it would set the stage for future success because of all the new fans who would see this incredible variety of cultures and fandom and history and all the things that go along with it," Schneider said.

"When things went sideways in terms of immigration and fear of people coming into the country, we became convinced we might not even see that wonderful collision of joyful culture."

Spracklen was hoping the World Cup would provide a chance for the U.S. to showcase its soccer culture but also to boost its global reputation, with fans coming into contact with everyday folks who put on more welcoming faces toward visitors than many officials.

"Will the people coming from other countries fortunate enough to get tickets, do they want to come watch their teams in the U.S.?" he asked. "Do they still feel safe? Do they feel welcome?"

"It's not something I would've even considered a couple of years ago. It wouldn't even have popped up in my mind at all."

El Tri, La Tri and Socceroos about to become familiar rooting interests

Meghan L. Hall
USA TODAY

The FIFA World Cup elevates the best soccer teams in the world, but also the best nicknames.

When the action kicks off, fans will be actively cheering on their favorite teams.

It won't be a surprise to hear people rooting for the top-ranked sides like France or even Spain or Argentina.

What might come as a surprise is the nicknames that every national team will be called.

Ever heard of the Les Bleus (The Blues)? Or perhaps the "Socceroos"?

If those names seem unique, they are. All 48 teams competing in World Cup play have a special nickname, and USA TODAY has compiled the full list of monikers for your viewing pleasure.

From birds to flowers to wolves, here is every team nickname for the 2026 FIFA World Cup:

GOLFWEEK’S FATHER OF THE YEAR

Matt Kuchar credits late father for emotional win

Adam Schupak
Golfweek | USA TODAY Network

Matt Kuchar remembers playing ping-pong nearly every night out on the back porch against his dad, Peter, as a kid. They were wars that hardened him into the competitor he grew into, a winner of nine PGA Tour events. During his career, Kuchar, who turns 48 on June 21, has hit millions of golf shots but none quite like the approach shot he stiffed at the final hole of the 2025 PNC Championship in Orlando in December.

Playing in the two-man team event with son Cameron, 18, Kuchar credited his dad, who had passed away suddenly from a heart attack earlier in the year, with being with him all day. There was no white-knuckle drama nor tension because Team Kuchar would tap in for eagle to shatter the tournament scoring record by five strokes, but there was plenty of emotion.

“I don’t know if you believe in karma, if you believe in fate, whatever you believe in, there’s something magical that does exist. I’m a believer in God, that Dad is up above looking down, and what happened on 18, I could hardly stand up and hit a shot. For me to hit it to a foot makes me think there’s something more out there,” said Kuchar before tearing up.

“Just miss ... miss Pops.”
It was a moment that touched the hearts of all who watched it, and it’s one of the reasons that Golfweek is proud to honor Matt – and by extension Peter – as its 2026 Father of the Year. Kuchar will be honored on June 20 at a ceremony at Reunion Resort in Kissimmee, Florida.

Matt is quick to point out that golf became the family sport because of his mom, Meg, who met Peter at Stetson University, a private school in DeLand, Florida. Peter was a senior and Meg a freshman. As the story goes, she was watching a friend compete in a tennis match when Peter, playing on a nearby court, spied her in the crowd and threw his match so he could introduce himself before she had a chance to leave.

“If you know Peter and the competitor that he is,” Meg said, “you know that’s not true, but he liked to say that and he did ask me to go to the beach with him the next day.”

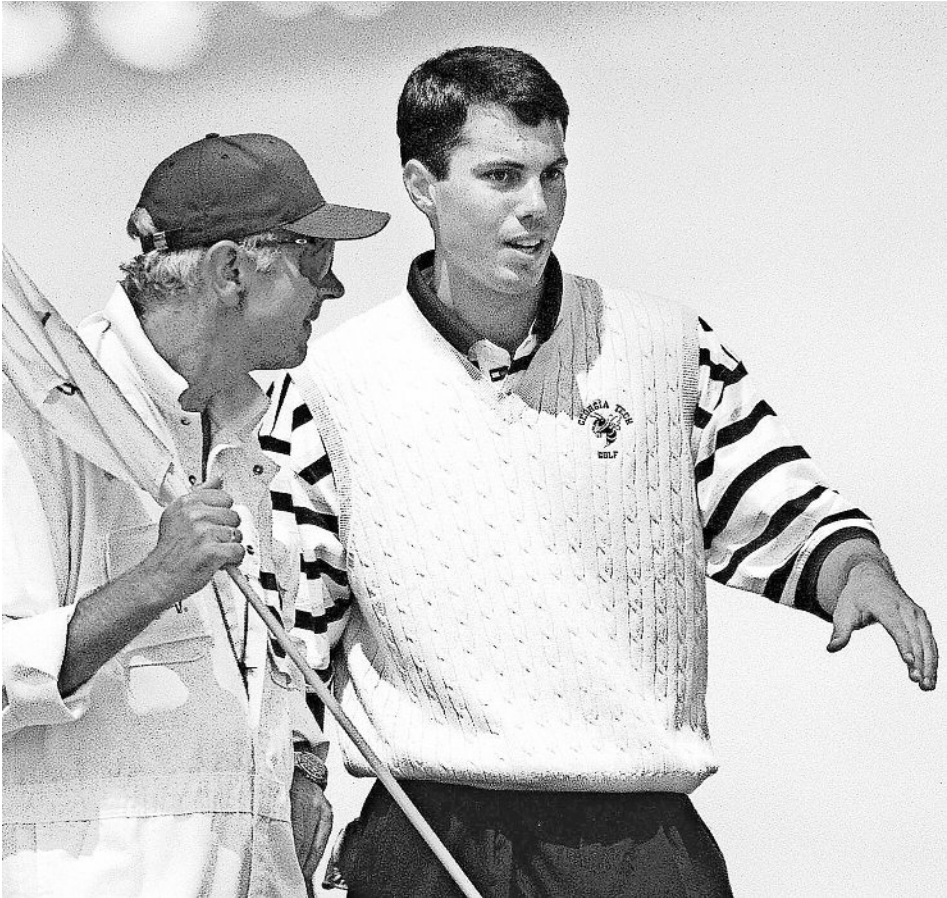

They were married for 51 years. Peter remained a devoted tennis player, becoming at one time ranked first in doubles in the state of Florida. He only had time to play golf twice a year in work-related charity outings. That is until Christmas in 1991, when Meg upgraded their tennis membership at Heathrow Country Club, near the family home in Orlando. She thought Peter was going to love this gift because it would be good for his insurance business – both to meet more people and because, frankly, more business happened on the golf course than on the tennis courts. But she could tell from the expression on his face that she had chosen poorly.

“It was priceless,” she recalled. “You could see cha-ching, cha-ching as he was figuring out what the gift I gave him was going to cost him, but he decided to keep it, and Matt followed him over to the golf side.”

Matt was skeptical about the present at first too. He thought golf was for old people. But Peter would let Matt drive the golf cart and he liked that. From the start, Matt was blessed with natural ability, and golfers would stop and watch him swing. Every day after high school, he’d get dropped off at the driving range and hit balls. When Peter was done with work, he’d join in and they’d go out and play nine holes. Over the years, various friends and parents asked Peter and Meg their secret for hooking Matt on golf with hopes of following in his footsteps.

“We never made him practice,” she said, “We made him come home.”

In retrospect, Meg concluded that it was the gift that kept on giving for the rest of their lives. Peter got the golf bug too, essentially walking away from tennis and becoming good enough at golf to shoot his age multiple times. In 1997, Matt won the U.S. Amateur with Peter

Matt Kuchar and his father, Peter, discuss a putt on the 10th green during the third round of the 1998 Masters. Matt Kuchar, this year’s Golfweek’s Father of the Year, turns 48 on June 21, Father’s Day. ROBERTO SCHMIDT/AFP VIA GETTY IMAGES as caddie, and was paired with Tiger Woods, the defending champion at the 1998 Masters. At least once a day, someone still stops Matt to tell him they remember watching him play his first Masters, where he finished low amateur, with his dad on the bag. Meg has never forgotten the impact they made those weeks.

“I had so many men come up to me with tears in their eyes on the grounds at Augusta because they were so touched by the father-son bond that Matt and Peter showed in the embrace when he won the U.S. Amateur that touched men’s hearts in such a big way,” Meg recalled.

Matt met his wife, Sybi, a tennis player at Georgia Tech and a year ahead of Matt, waiting in line with various athletes for drug testing. They didn’t date in college, but after teaching tennis in San Francisco for a few years upon graduation, she returned to Georgia and they reconnected. Their first date was at the Shark Shootout in Naples, Florida. They were engaged six months later and married a year after their first date. Both of their two sons have followed in the footsteps of one of their parents’ primary sports – Cameron is headed to Texas Christian University in the fall on a golf scholarship and Carson, 16, is the top-ranked doubles tennis player for his age.

Matt and Sybi prioritized family, traveling together on the road and home-schooling the boys to keep the family unit together longer than anyone else following the PGA Tour.

“Somebody told us early on, don’t let school interfere with your child’s education. We took that to heart and thought, there’s so much to learn about life being on the road,” Matt said.

Just as Matt’s mom used to take him to Fenway Park and for lobster rolls during a tournament in Boston, the Kuchars have always tacked on an extra week during overseas trips and taken their boys surfing in Nicaragua, cutting trails and farming in New Zealand and celebrating Cameron’s fifth birthday in Turkey with a traditional Turkish bath.

As for his secret to getting his kids interested in sports? Matt did everything he could to make the experience fun. He’d bring baseball gloves and a ball to the range and play catch. Then they’d have BB gun target practice and somewhere in between they’d hit a few balls. On the tennis court, he’d let the boys take aim at him with spongy, low-compression balls.

Matt and Sybi resisted the temptation to start their boys in one sport when they were young. They feared that too much pressure might make playing a game feel like a job. Both boys were encouraged to play every sport under the sun until they discovered their passion.

As he spoke about his parenting style, Matt dropped this gem: “I think the best lessons are the ones that are caught and not taught,” he said.

Matt described his relationship with Cameron as more than father-son; he’s become a best friend and a training partner in recent years. Matt said he’s always been guided by a philosophy ingrained into him by his father:

“I’m there to raise a boy to become a man,” Matt said.

Matt sounds the part of the proud papa when he says Cameron is far more talented than he ever was at his age, and describes Cam as better than most of his contemporaries on the PGA Tour when he gets a wedge in his hands. One day, not long ago, he found out just how good Cameron can be when son beat father for the first time. An eagle at 10 and Cameron grabbed a commanding lead. “I said, ‘Holy cow, and this is the part of my trying to get in his head using the fatherly advantage. I said, ‘You’re 4 up on me, aren’t you?’ He definitely knew exactly how he stood,” Matt remembered.

With the deficit whittled to one on the final hole, Cameron had about 10 feet for par.

“He made it and instantly broke into this huge smile on his face,” Matt recounted. “It was a weird feeling because you hope to hold them off as long as possible, but at the same time I was awfully proud and I knew that day was coming.”

The family’s move from St. Simons Island, Georgia, to Tequesta, Florida, was motivated not by golf for Matt and Cameron but rather for a higher level of tennis education and competition for Carson, who has developed his game at Ibis Club under Jay Berger, a former U.S. Davis Cup team member and the father of PGA Tour winner Daniel Berger.

“It was time for a bigger pond for the boys,” Matt said.

He is self-aware enough to know he’s been the big winner of the father-son golf dynamic that has allowed Cameron to be his caddie at the PGA Tour’s Valpar Championship in March and recently at U.S. Open Final Qualifying.

“I tell people I feel awfully lucky that my boys both like playing golf,” he said. “The amount of time I get to spend with them because they like playing golf is priceless.”

Among Matt’s most treasured rounds were those played with four generations of Kuchars – including his grandfather, Maurice, “Big Kuch,” a window washer, who immigrated from Ukraine during the Bolshevik Revolution. Matt’s biggest win as a pro came at the 2012 Players Championship in Ponte Vedra Beach, Florida, not far from where Meg and Peter had lived since 2001 and where Meg remains, and it made him eligible for the PNC Championship.

Meg said Peter looked forward to that tournament “like nobody’s business” while Sybi called it the favorite week of the year for the boys. In 2018, Matt and Peter teamed up to compete in it for the first time, which resulted in this humorous story that Peter told of receiving an email from Matt that said simply, “Get Ready!”

“I ran into Jim Furyk at TPC (Sawgrass) and he said, ‘I hear you are playing in the ‘PNC.’ I said ‘I’m not sure that that’s true,’ ” Peter recalled that year.

He initially missed the attachment on that email that listed the tournament’s participants. In that first year, the boys still were too young to play and Peter treasured the memories of sinking some long-range birdie putts. He loved seeing his nameplate on a placard on the range. “He ate that up with a spoon,” Meg said.

In the ensuing years, Peter lived to be a caddie for his grandsons, who alternate playing with Matt. Peter waited for the invitation to arrive with the joy of a child on Christmas morning.

Peter and Meg were on a cruise in the Virgin Islands and off the coast of St. Barths celebrating Meg’s 70th birthday when he went for a swim and had a heart attack on Feb. 4, 2025.

“He was in love with me and happy and whole and healthy and then he was gone in a blink,” Meg said.

Matt was practicing ahead of the WM Phoenix Open when he received a text from his mom that something was wrong. Just two days earlier, Matt spoke with his dad on the phone via FaceTime for the final time.

There’s always a tomorrow, until there’s not.

“He misses his dad,” Meg said. “We all miss his dad terribly, but God’s been very good in giving us signs from the very beginning that he’s got Peter and he’s got us too.”

For instance, there was the time when she had to leave St. Barth’s for the next port and a double rainbow appeared in the sky.

“That felt like God telling me that he had Peter and I was OK to go,” she recalled.

At the 2025 PNC Championship, the whole family gathered, including Matt’s sister, Rebecca, for Peter’s favorite week. Meg could feel his presence everywhere. She found it hard to walk into the host hotel and run into people who were unaware of Peter’s passing. But on that final day, she felt her husband’s presence all day long. So, too, did Matt. “It was beyond what would have felt normal just to play so well,” he said. “I felt like there must have been something extra helping us along.”

After all the family pictures on the green with their matching champion’s red-leather belts, Matt wasn’t ready to end the celebration. Winning happens too infrequently, and so Matt kept the party going.

“All of us except my grandson, who was working, ended up checking back into the Ritz and spending an extra night to revel in the joy of the moment,” Meg said.

Father and son wore their belts out to dinner that night, and then all the kids went ice skating at a temporary rink set-up for the holiday season. Cameron kept his belt on all night when he wasn’t letting everybody try it on. “We had a ball,” Meg said.

For Meg, it was a full-circle moment as men approached her again in tears like they did all those years ago at Augusta, overwhelmed by the emotional response they felt of a heart-warming father-son moment.

“Men don’t really cry much, but something about this moment touched them,” she said. “Unfortunately, I think so many men push their boys away too soon and go to the handshake and whatever and aren’t going to embrace them and kiss them and hug them and all that and they miss that or always long for it if they never got it. And seeing Matt and Cam out there, they still hug and embrace and let each other know that they love each other.”

Just as they will always love Pops.
